BRADLEY NEARLY BEATEN

By the Memories of the Sponsorship
Contest Over the Battleship
Kentucky 10 Years Ago

When Mrs. John G. South, of Frankfort, Ky., who was named last week at Washington secretary of the new Association of Sponsors for Battleships, few persons outside of her immediate family knew that she is the same Kentucky girl whose appointment as sponsor of the battleship Kentucky created such a tremendous sensation, involving in the controversy two secretaries of the navy, a governor of Kentucky, a Kentucky colonel, several senators and congressmen, the "jackies" of the battleship, another Kentucky belle, and, incidentally, the latter's sweetheart, who became her husband through taking sides.

Mrs. South is the only daughter of William O. Bradley, who was then governor of the state, and who has been elected United States senator. The old controversy was used against him in his campaign.

The other Kentucky belle in the case was Miss Harriette Bainbridge Richardson, whose sweet heart of school days, whose attention was attracted again to her by the controversy, was James Tandy Ellis, a young Kentucky poet, now private secretary to Congressman Owsley Stanley, of the second Kentucky district. The navy officers involved were Secretary Hilary A. Herbert and Secretary John D. Long, who succeeded him. Miss Richardson was one of Kentucky's most charming and beautiful women and belonged to a pioneer aristocratic family.

While visiting her sister, the wife of Captain Forney, at Washington, at a dinner given in her honor by Congressman Bennett, Secretary Herbert was one of the guests. In a pretty speech he declared that when the battleship Kentucky was ready to be launched, Miss Richardson should christen it. The guests drank merrily to the health of the fair Southern visitor and the battleship.

Wanted to Use Whisky

When Miss Richardson returned to Lexington she told her intimate friends of the honor bestowed upon her by the secretary and conceived the idea of christening the battleship with whisky. Major Barrak G. Thomas, the noted thoroughbred breeder, offered for the purpose a sample of his forty-year-old bourbon from the choicest corner of his wine cellar. Miss Richardson sent a bottle of the whisky to Secretary Herbert and asked that he and President Cleveland sample it to see if it met with their approval.

But the uncertainty of politics placed at the head of the Navy Department a new man in the person of John D. Long, and as chief executive of Kentucky William O. Bradley. When the preparations were begun for christening the Kentucky Secretary Long passed the honors of naming a sponsor over to Governor Bradley. The Kentucky colonels, the "jackies" on the battleship and Miss Richardson waited with bated breath his action. Governor Bradley named his daughter, Miss Christine, then a school girl of 17, for the honor.

Then there arose a storm of protests from throughout the country. Letters were written to the newspapers by many persons and one that appeared in a Louisville paper was by James Tandy Ellis, the former schoolmate and sweetheart of Miss Richardson.

Where the Romance Came In

She recognized the initials signed to the article and, writing to the editor of the paper procured his address. Then she wrote thanking him for his words of rebuke to the men who had turned her down. Correspondence resulted which ended in their marriage two years later. Miss Bradley proposed to christen the battleship with water, but this did not meet with the approval of public sentiment, and she finally broke the usual decanter of champagne over the ship's prow at what was one of the most notable gatherings in the history of the time-honored custom.

There always has been a mystery as to what became of the bottle of whisky sent to Secretary Herbert, as it was understood that official declared he never received it, and, up to the time of his death, Major Thomas often referred to the lost bottle of liquor, saying he would like to have an expression of its quality.

Bradley Almost Beaten

Strange to say it was his position on the temperance question which nearly kept Bradley out of the United States senate. The republican platform was pledged to temperance and for this reason several members of the legislature opposed to the election of former Governor Beckham to the senate refused for a long time to support Bradley.
